Thoughts of Carmen

Speaking on what matters to me; what should matter to you.

'It is time for civil disobedience. It is time to wake up. It is time to rebel.' (Yes, that includes white people)

Civil disobedience is the active, professed refusal of a citizen to obey certain laws, demands, orders or commands of a government. By some definitions, civil disobedience has to be nonviolent to be called 'civil'. Hence, civil disobedience is sometimes equated with peaceful protests or nonviolent resistance.

This may be a lengthy article, but it is nothing compared to the journey that the black community has been through. So far, in the USA, black people have been subject to 246 years of slavery (1619-1865), 89 years of segregation (1865-1954) and 66 years of oppression (that being 1954-present day). That is, collectively, 401 years of outright mistreatment. That is, in terms of oppression, 66 years and counting of a so-called 'freedom' that we, as a diaspora, have not yet received. I understand that in the current climate, spare time may be sparse but I really do hope you can take some time out of your week to read what needs to be said and digest what needs to be read.

Firstly, I'd simply like to say thank you to whoever is reading this. By clicking on the link, I would assume it means you have a desire to support and educate yourself on the many topics regarding the Black Lives Matter movement. Thank you for taking that small yet enormous step into making the world a better place. No matter the colour of your skin, your age or location, this article should be of some use to you. Secondly, I want to make it very clear that though I use the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, USA as an example in this piece of writing, he is one of many. Everything I say below applies to every single instance in which a person of the black community is mistreated. Do not treat George Floyd's death as an anomaly and do not treat racism as a somewhat distant, American-only occurrence. Do not treat the recent spark in activism as a trend. The UK is not innocent. I, a 17 year old girl of colour, have personally been subject to verbal racial abuse, having slurs shouted at me on the streets of London. There is no doubt that some of my friends and family can speak of similar experiences. Systemically, racism also still persists. In the UK, from the day a black child is born, the odds are stacked against them. A black mother is more likely to suffer a miscarriage than her white counterpart. A black schoolboy is three times more likely to be permanently excluded compared to the whole school population. Black students are less likely to be accepted into a Russell Group university than their white counterparts. These listed disparities will have already massively affected a black person's chances in life before they turn 20. After that, until the day we die, come more. These are statistics that cannot be escaped no matter how old or successful a black person is. They exist at every single level. Just because the police here rarely shoot, does not mean that this country is not still very much systematically racist. Racism is undeniably rife in Britain, amongst the people who hold the most power, all the way down to the grassroots level.

As a young person of colour, the recent heightened exposure in the media of the numerous examples of severe racial injustices across America, have left me feeling numerous types of ways. In the individual case of the murder of George Floyd, to watch the widely circulating video of a man's life being taken away from him, triggers the initial feeling of helplessness. One can not help but imagine how George must have felt. How helpless he was in that situation, pinned down by the neck with the weight of another human – a human whose job was to do the complete opposite, who's job is to protect. Helplessness, is to watch that video through a mobile phone, 4,009 miles away, being in no position to pull that officer away. It is being in no position of power that means I could have been able to have stopped that officer from committing such an evil act. It is shouting at your phone screen knowing that no matter how loud you shout, you are of no help to that innocent man. With helplessness comes guilt, the question being am I, as an individual, doing enough to put an end to this stuff? Next, there is fear. Fear of how the media will spin this story to present the oppressed to be the problem. Fear of the further hate and violence that will spree in retaliation and consequently, an accelerated fear for the safety and the lives of the black community.

A list of the names of people in the UK who's lives were taken due to unjust treatment by people who's job is to protect us from and route out, the evil in society.

The unusual mass outcry that stemmed from this specific incident however, sparked an emotion that in these situations, I rarely end up feeling. Week in week out, across the world, there are reports of yet another racial injustice, yet another death. Rarely do their outcomes bring me the feeling of hope. This is down to the fact that often the so-called 'activism' on social media instead appears to me as yet another trend. We constantly see the tiring, repetitive cycle of people posting memorials and hashtagging that 'black lives matter' but never see the end of the cycle of racial oppression. We see people in a position of racial privilege that enables them to be able to make an actual change, posting that they 'see us' and 'hear us' but not engaging in any meaningful discourse about the problem on or off of social media. As a result of this, after the short wave of hope comes despair. It comes with the realisation that this has been the case for years, that this half hearted passive response is not working and that it is simply not widely understood that this is not a matter that the black community can solve alone.

One thing that some people may not understand is how deafening their silence on these issues really is. Deafening to their friends and family of colour, deafening to the black community as a collective. To remain unspoken in this situation is what the oppressor wants you to do. To remain unspoken due to fear that you may say the wrong thing is no longer good enough. To remain unspoken in fear that you may lose a couple followers or a connection with a friend or family member, is no help. Being very outspoken on this issue over social media and in real life has seen my follower counts go down, connections with friends being lost, and levels of respect for and from countless people lessened. To be frank, I do not care. Would you really rather yet another life be taken – one that can never be revived – than lose a follower, a 'friend', a significant other? If someone does not actively support or is in disagreement with you over a topic like this, are they really worthy of your love and respect? Stop excusing your friends, stop excusing racism and stop excusing the loss of lives. Be the angry woman that society does not want you to be. Be the friend who breaks the toxic trend of social conformity. Have the opinions that we are, from a young age, moulded to not have. Be difficult. Sacrifice relations that are not worth your time and make a change.

The faces of only a handful of people who lost their lives to police brutality in the USA Learn their individual stories. Say their names.

It is long overdue and it is much needed. It is time for people to educate themselves and aid the black community. It is time for white people to acknowledge their racial privilege and use it effectively. It is time to break the deafening silence. It is time for civil disobedience. It is time to wake up. It is time to rebel.

This is what you can do. These are a few of the many ways you can help:

A simple but often overlooked action. Reach out to your black friends.

Check up on them. Every single time the black community sees these acts of senseless injustice, we are overcome with the feelings I previously mentioned. Every week we witness these acts on social media and in real life. Every week we go through the cycle of feeling that helplessness, guilt, fear, anger and despair. It is tiring. It is traumatising. It takes a toll on our mental health. This needs to be spoken about. This, as an action, should be a bare minimum but it is a start. It is a start of the raw conversations that accompany such a raw topic and it is a simple action that I can, from the bottom of my heart say, will make a big difference to somebody who is struggling. Show that you personally care and show you are an ally to your friends and family.

Educate yourself. Then educate others.

Below I have listed materials, of all forms, so that you can go beyond and make a change. Educate yourself and others on racism, systematic oppression, anti-blackness, white privilege etc. Review the roles that you and the communities that you are a part of play in the continuance of the system of white supremacy. Some black people will happily engage in conversations on this topic.

Some will sit down with you for hours, type paragraphs upon paragraphs in order to aid your education on the matter and they will not once get bored of it. Some of us however, are tired. Tired of putting the effort in and being met with little to no interest, much ignorance and zero change. Tired of feeding ourselves to the lions; the lions being the people who blame us and call us racist when we speak on racial disparity. The lions who call us negative for speaking up on how we are treated and lions who merely disregard our passion as being 'the angry

black person who hates white people'. When we as black people speak out we risk a lot. We risk so much and see nothing in return.

We see loss of opportunity, friends, family and respect for simply speaking out on what needs to be spoken of. In return for these losses

A simple but often overlooked action. Reach out to your black friends.

we gain very little. So I ask you, no matter where you start, whether you converse with somebody who is willing, whether you listen to relevant music, read books/articles, watch films, documentaries, whatever it is – I ask you to educate yourself. And once you've done that, discuss. Discuss with your white friends, your black friends and everybody in between. Leave no stone unturned. You reading thus far shows interest. Turn that interest into action.

Call people out.

Do not be scared. Be vocal and proud about the side you are on, your opinion on the situation, and encourage others to do the same. One result of white privilege is the fact that you, as an individual, are able to do many things that black people cannot – without the repercussions, without the blame and without the oppression. If this applies to you, acknowledge it. Use this positively and be smart with it. If people around you are racist in front of you, call them out. Not all racism comes from individual intent to harm, nor is racism born into someone. It is often taught to the most impressionable in society, the ones who are brought up not knowing any different. Some racism stems from ignorance and lack of education and it is now your place to educate. Not everybody will listen. Not everybody will instantly nor ever change, but an attempt to make a change – especially as your racial privilege means that the system will allow you to speak up on these things – is better than none. You speaking out in support of the black community helps us massively. We are tired and we are scared. It is better to try to make a change than to sit back and let that one comment slip in the school playground, the office, the group chat, the dinner table. There is power in numbers. Find your allies and try to educate as a group. I am not asking you to fight nor do I wish for you to put yourself in extreme danger to stop a racist who may not listen. I am simply asking you to start the conversation with the people who need to hear it. After all, your white privilege makes it much easier for you to do it. The system, from the day you are born until the day you die, makes it that way.

Well then, we as a society have a lot to do. We all have a part to play. I do not expect a big change nor a solution by next week but the least we can expect is an effort. Surely that is the least that we are owed. I want to see a change in discourse and a change in the action that you take. Be active, not passive. Be proud. Be the change. Be an ally. Be the outspoken one that the powers do not want you to be. Just be human. For every week that you sit back and choose not to do something, lives are ruined. For every week that you don't speak out in fear of losing friends and followers, lives are lost. So I ask you only one question: Will you aid us or will you aid the oppressor?
